RWANDA:

Repatriation Needs More Than Aid

The new Rwandan Patriotic Front-dominated government and the international community are trying to stop refugee flows and to persuade more than 2 million refugees, most of them Hutus, to return to Rwanda. This week RPF ministers will visit refugees in neighboring countries and some 1.5 million displaced persons in the French-patrolled safe zone to try to persuade them to return home, according to press reports, but the government almost certainly will tightly control any repatriation program.

- The new regime wants UN peacekeepers to provide security for returnees in border areas, [redacted]

The refugees include some intact military units, radical Hutu militiamen, and government officials who orchestrated anti-Tutsi pogroms. [redacted] These officials still can sway the refugees and, fearing RPF retribution, are likely to try to block Hutus from returning.

- The UN peacekeepers' schedule for deployment outside Kigali may be unduly optimistic because it depends on ill-equipped African contingents; Ghana and Zimbabwe, which are to provide two of the UN force's four infantry battalions, have serious doubts about participation. [redacted]

Since early April, international agencies and nongovernmental organizations working in Rwanda and neighboring countries have received nearly $300 million in international donations, according to [redacted] press reports. The European Union and its member states have contributed about 40 percent. [redacted]

The UN Secretary General plans to appeal today for another $300 million to cover the expanded humanitarian needs in Rwanda, and the EU intends to divert an additional $185 million, [redacted]
